Excerpt: .out together, but those who did get out first were not even up to their knees in water. The old man, who was too helpless to more, and the young man were the last, and they were lifted into the water by the Turks, who immediately rowed off. The river side deepens rapidly at this place, so that these two unfortunate men were in much deeper water than their companions. Whetlier they could have saved themselves without assistance is doubtful, but there is no doubt whatever that they might easily have been saved by others. At the moment the Jews began to leave the boat, the Rournan soldiers, about 20 in number, were ordered to line the shore and prevent the Jews from landing; some of the soldiers were arm, -d, the others were not, at all events the poor Jews were not only afraid to land, but they backed into the water as far as they could from the soldiers. A certain commotion was then produced amongst the people on shore by the drowning of these two men. The soldiers received counterorders, and the surviving Jews were allowed to get out of the water; 6 of them did so alone, the two others were so paralyzed by fright that the soldiers had to pull them out. Of these two, one has scarcely recovered from his fright, and the other is raring mad. The publicity of this event and the sensation which it produced...
