RareBooksClub. Paperback. Book Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. Paperback. 28 pages. OCLC Number: 58531339 Excerpt: . . . all levels had come to expect that in any future war, they would conduct operations with fire that equaled or even surpassed the lavish support they had recently enjoyed in northwest Europe. It was clear almost from the beginning, however, that this was not going to happen in Korea because there was a shortage not only of artillery units but also of the basic hardware of the cannoneers craft - guns and munitions. Until the front settled down into a war of attrition in the fall of 1951 (which facilitated the surveying of reference points and positioning of an elaborate grid of batteries, fire direction centers, and fire support coordination centers), massed fires were achieved by shooting at unprecedented speed. This tactic, in turn, exposed the fact that the huge surplus of World War II munitions was actually deficient in some calibers, and strict ammunition rationing became the norm until production caught up with demand in the last days of the fighting. When the North Korean Peoples Army swarmed south across the 38th Parallel on 25 June 1950, Americas arsenal of artillery was little different than it had been when Germany invaded Poland and was identical to our inventory at the end of World War II. While it was identical in terms of hardware and doctrine like the rest of the postwar Army, the number of combat-ready field artillery battalions had shrunk radically in both number and even tubes per unit. After the war, a variety of reorganizational schemes had been proposed for the field artillery, but they all agreed on certain basics: the need to improve mobility, fire direction,...
