Probably there were no more than half a million people, men, women, and children, within its four million acres. There were no towns of any size. Leeds was a collection of mean streets clustering about an old bridge. Sheffield was a rookery of squalid houses at the foot of a wild moorland. Bradford was no more than a big village closely packed in a hollow of the hills. Hull sent out a few ships from the quays which lay behind its one street of any importance. Scarborough was a collection of fishermen's cottages, nestling closely together under the protection of a ruinous castle. Harrogate was a hamlet of nondescript buildings, half-inns, half-farmsteads, which stood about a mineral spring, in the middle of a waste. The market-towns, still semi-mediaeval in appearance, were little more than meeting-places for husbandmen and hucksters. There was little noise of machinery in the other towns, and little movement in the land; folk stayed, from birth to death, where fate had set them down; of animation, evidence of energy, desire for progress, there was nothing, save amongst a few ardent but unencouraged spirits. In York Minster silence and desolation brooded heavily in the deserted aisles and desecrated sanctuary; within York Castle they hanged strong men for the theft of a goat, or the stealing of a sheep. And on Micklegate Bar, plainly to be seen by all who entered the ancient city, still stood, firmly fixed on pikes, the grisly...
