What ails you, John? asked his wife with rough kindness; I am afraid that you have one of your headaches. I have no headache, replied Sands, turning away to get the candle and match-box: he could not have added and no heartache either. What an odd woman that Bell Stone is! exclaimed Nancy, after a short interval of silence, during which John lighted the candle. She was on the other side of the road just as I was passing the schoolhouse; she stood still, watching me as a terrier watches a rabbit-hole, and then took the trouble of crossing the road on purpose to meet me. Good evening/ said I, not wishing to be stopped for...
